WHEN I begin a presy tale, too long and there to mention, Jim Boggs was never known to fall to give profound attention. His soulful eyes are fixed on me, his ears are forward shanted, and all the time he loaks at me like one who is trackented. And when my westy tale is done, that most attentive felier remarks. Pray tell another one; yon're sure a story teller!" In this sad world most people sleep when one unwinds a story, or else they wring their lambs and weep, and say the yarn is heary. But Jim, he listens to a tale, and greets the joke with language; his mitth is like a mighty gale that shakes the hearn and rafter. And so I stand up strong for James, as through the town. I'm straying, and I informs whatever games he happens to be playing. And he has heaters by the card, who to his standard railly; and he has irrends in every ward, in every street and alley. And when he runs for county clerk, for shariff or surveyor, his loyal friends, get in their work, and every one's a stayer. The man who listens wisely well it ne'er by friends fornaken; and when he shoots he rings the bell, and carries home the haten.
